sibility of administering assistance to those in need. Functions, in addition to dispensing financial assistance, included the providing of minimal casework services to clients—particularly services aimed at rehabilitation—and the placement and supervision of children in foster homes and institutions. City Agency, located in a metropolis of several million persons, handled about 40,000 active cases and employed about 1,000 persons. There were six hierarchical levels, five above the operating employees. The first-line supervisors were in charge of units containing five or six workers. County Agency served a city of approximately 100,000 persons and its surrounding county. The caseload for this agency averaged about 6,000, and approximately 150 persons were employed, organized into four hierarchical levels, three above the caseworker or clerk. The average unit under the first-line supervisor contained seven workers.

The two agencies were engaged in different types of welfare programs. County Agency administered the categorical welfare programs, which include Aid to Dependent Children, Aid to the Blind, and Old Age Assistance (ADC, BA, OAA). These programs operate with federal, state, and local funds, and were established to provide aid to special types of needy persons on a relatively long-term basis. This agency also placed children in foster homes and institutions and supervised their care. City Agency was in charge of the general assistance program. This program, financed by state and local funds, was intended to supplement the categorical welfare programs by assisting persons in need who were unable to qualify for one of the categorical programs. The differences in these programs have important implications for worker-client relations in the two agencies. The workers in County Agency, being engaged in providing long-term categorical assistance, were able to establish more permanent relations with their clients than were City Agency workers. On the other hand, requirements for assistance were more rigid and the process of investigating client eligibility was more lengthy in County Agency. Another difference between the agencies was that the County program included no provisions for the granting of immediate or even emergency relief; clients requiring such aid had to be referred to other agencies. City Agency did grant such emergency relief; in fact, it served as "a court of last appeal" for the city's needy.

The duties of the public-assistance caseworkers in the two agencies were essentially similar. They were primarily engaged in determining the eligibility of clients for public assistance and, whenever possible, providing casework services to them. The workers interviewed in City Agency were all engaged in administering the general assistance program although other types of caseworkers were employed there. In County Agency, not only public-assistance workers but also those engaged in all other programs were included in the study. The bulk of these other workers were serving child-welfare or adult-service cases. Caseloads for public-assistance workers averaged over 100 cases per worker in both agencies. The caseloads for child-welfare and adult-service workers in County Agency were much smaller, averaging about 50 cases per worker.

City Agency was the more specialized in some respects, and County Agency in others. There were certainly more specialized departments in City Agency; medical, employment, and legal services, for example, were set up as separate departments. The worker whose case indicated a need for help in one of these areas referred the client there for service. In County Agency, each worker had to perform these services for his clients, if they were to be performed at all, since no specialists were available. On the other hand, County Agency had specialized workers engaged in "intensive" casework (that is, carrying a smaller number of cases in order that more time could be devoted to each case), whereas City Agency did not employ such workers.

The two agencies also differed in the manner in which procedures and regulations were transmitted to workers. In County Agency each worker possessed a personal copy of the "County Manual," a large loose-leaf volume containing all the rules and procedures governing the operations of the casework staff. This manual was regularly and painstakingly revised, and workers were admonished to consult it before approaching their supervisor for help in solving problems. In City Agency there was no such manual, and while changes in procedures were periodically distributed to the workers in the form of mimeographed bulletins, there were no requirements for filing them in a permanent binder.

Turning to the conditions of employment in the two agencies, the hiring of workers in City Agency was governed by its own regulations, whereas the County Agency workers were under state Civil Service and underwent an appropriate examination. The salaries were essentially similar in the two agencies: beginning at about $300 per month, each agency provided for regular increments for experience to a maximum about 50 per cent above the starting figure. Turnover in City Agency was much higher than in County, one important consequence of this turnover being that there were always several vacant positions whose caseloads had to be covered by other workers. Such a situation, which did not exist in County Agency, no doubt served to increase work pressures somewhat in City Agency. Finally, provisions were made for educational leave in both agencies, but several kinds of scholarship aid were available to workers in County Agency which were lacking in City Agency.

The director of City Agency did not have a professional degree in social work nor did he possess any experience in this field prior to his appointment. The director of County Agency, on the other hand, held advanced degrees both in social work and in social-work administration. His professional orientation was reflected in his extensive efforts to improve welfare legislation in the state as well as in certain agency programs he had set up, such as the educational inducements mentioned above. The educational differences marking the two staffs appear to reflect the differences between the directors' orientations. Although 28 per cent of the City staff had one year or more of graduate work as opposed to 9 per cent of the County staff, if we consider only graduate training in social work the differences are reversed: only 17 per cent of the City staff had any graduate training in social work in contrast to 42 per cent of the County staff. There is little difference between the first-line supervisors of the two agencies in amount of total education or in amount of social-work education. But in the upper levels of the organizations differences again appear: all of the heads of professional departments in County Agency held a graduate degree in social work, but not all of their counterparts in City Agency held such a degree.

Considering finally the background differences of the personnel in the two agencies, County Agency employed more women, more persons under 30, and more persons with children at home than did City Agency. In addition, County Agency contained a larger number of workers with more than three years' seniority; and its workers were more likely than City's to state that they expected still to be employed by the agency several years in the future. The latter differences are, of course, related to the higher turnover of staff in City Agency. Apparently, the position of caseworker was often a temporary job in City Agency.

These differences in personnel are no doubt partly due to differences in the management and the program of the two agencies. However, they probably also reflect another important factor: there was more opportunity for workers in the metropolitan area to step into the more desirable positions offered by private agencies. County Agency did not face this kind of competition for its personnel inasmuch as there were few private agencies in the county and they tended to be relatively small and weak. Other employment opportunities for college graduates were probably also better in the large metropolis than in the less diversified smaller community. Finally, more workers in City Agency came from working-class families (as indicated by father's occupation) than was the case in County Agency. Social work seems to have been more frequently an avenue of upward mobility for City Agency workers than for those in County Agency.

Bibliography

[Compiled by Patricia Denton in collaboration with the authors]

The period since 1945—especially since 1950—has seen a rapid increase of interest in the study of formal organization. Systematic compilation of the literature in this field becomes consequently a more pressing and difficult task. The more than 800 items in the bibliography which follows represent a third of a larger bibliography which we have compiled.[1] Several major sources have facilitated this work: Sociological Abstracts (published since 1953), the abstracts in Administrative Science Quarterly (since 1956), and several previous bibliographies, notably Merton et al. (1952), Eisenstadt (1958), March and Simon (1958), and Barton (1960).[2]

In making our selections, we placed emphasis on the following types of literature: (1) empirical studies of formal organizations and closely related discussions; (2) studies utilizing a sociological approach, that is, emphasizing structural rather than strictly psychological or purely administrative problems; and (3) publications in the English language which appeared during the past decade. The application of these criteria has necessarily led to the underrepresentation in our bibliography of large bodies of literature which might well have been included in a more comprehensive listing—such as work on public and business administration, small-group experiments, studies of decision-making, discussions of occupations and professions, and reflections based on practical experience with organizational problems. At the end of the bibliography, however, the reader will find a list of other bibliographies which will serve as a supplementary guide to some of these areas.

The references below are arranged alphabetically by author and chronologically under author. In addition, each item has been assigned a three-part code which roughly indicates the type of study, type of organization, and major subject matter reported in the book or article. The following is an explanation of the code:

I. TYPE OF STUDY

1. Empirical study of one organization, or of one or more segments of a single organization.
2. Empirical study of more than one organization or of their segments.
3. Research on related problems, typically studies that focus either on the characteristics of a population associated with organizations or on some problems that often occur in organizations, for example, research on the publics of organizations, participation in organizations, decision-making, conformity, professionalism.

4. Theoretical and methodological analyses.
5. General discussions and surveys of the literature, possibly drawing on some empirical studies but not reporting original research.
6. Readers, collected papers, and texts which cannot be classified in a single one of the above categories.

II. TYPE OF ORGANIZATION

M Mutual benefit associations, in general.
Mu Labor unions.
Mv Voluntary associations (except unions), such as political parties, interest groups, religious organizations, philanthropic organizations, professional associations.
B Business concerns, in general.
Bi Industrial concerns, for example, manufacturing firms.
Bc Commercial concerns, for example, stores.
S Service organizations, mixed types (such as medical schools) and in general.
Sm Medical organizations, notably hospitals.
Ss Social work, educational, and other service organizations.
C Commonweal organizations, including military services, (nonservice) government agencies, (noncommercial) research organizations.
V Various kinds of organizations (several of the four basic types).
O Not about organizations.

III. MAJOR TOPIC

1. Approach and method: the concept and study of formal organizations; critiques and reviews of various approaches to the study of formal organization; methods and research procedures.
2. Theories and typologies of organizations.
3. Publics: relations between organization and public (both public-in-contact and public-at-large), orientation of officials to public and of public to organization, organization of public, and the like.
4. Peer groups: informal relations and norms; performance, morale, and attitudes (especially of the rank and file).
5. Communication patterns among peers and in hierarchical structures.
6. Supervision, authority relationship, and leadership.
7. Management of the organization: policy formation, planning; impersonal mechanisms of control (such as automation), hierarchical structure in general.
8. Social context: interorganization relations, cross-cultural comparisons, relations between the community and the organization, influence of cultural values and ideologies on the organization.
9. Dynamics: change, dialectical processes, bureaucratization and the problem of democratic control, the individual personality and the organization.

O. Occupations and professions: orientations and characteristics of occupational groups (especially, professional vs. bureaucratic), relations within and between occupational groups, occupational origins, careers, and job mobility of organization members.
X. General discussions, covering a variety of topics, such as texts.

According to this scheme, an empirical investigation of the effects of automation in one industrial organization (such as Walker, 1957) would be coded as 1/Bi/7. But the code should be taken only as a rough—although we hope nevertheless useful—guide to content.

The code also serves to integrate the bibliography with the text of this book. Part II (type of organization) is derived from the typology proposed in Chapter II. Categories 1–9 of Part III (subject matter) correspond in general to the key topics dealt with in chapters with a corresponding number. Most of the items footnoted in the text may also be found in the bibliography, although the topic code of a reference does not necessarily correspond to the chapter where it is cited, since a study primarily concerned with one topic may be cited for a specific reason under quite another.
